Every Saturday the twelve-year-old Kurdish boy Mert Aydoghan together with his grandmother comes to the most famous and crowded street in Istanbul – Istiklal. He comes here since 4 years old. On that day hundreds of Kurds organize a demonstration demanding from the Turkish government information on the whereabouts of their relatives who have been missing for years.

“I have a friend who is always coming to this demonstration. Of course, we could stay at home and play games but we understand that our relatives are more important because they are arrested, then they disappear and get killed,” says Aydoghan who wants to be an astronomer when he grows up.

The Armenian Genocide and its denial are a major cause of the problems Turkey faces today, says a Turkish human rights activist.

Speaking to Tert.am, Ayse Gunaysu, a member of the Istanbul-based Human Rights Association, described denialism as a kind of curse upon the country and condemnation. She said Turkey hasn't seen peace ever since, with the bloodsheds going on and the Kurdish rebellions following one another. Gunaysu, who is also a columnist for the Armenian Weekly, noted that Turkey, has no real democracy, despite the military coups that occurred repeatedly.

The Turkish activist thinks the country has to find itself in the position of a loser to realize the importance of treating others well.

Let's pin down the headline at the neighbour's!

Turkey-Armenia Journalists' Dialogue Programme

My attitude has always been realistic and the Turkey-Armenia relations is not an exception. The more I learn about Turkey the less chances I see for the two countries to normalize their relations officially due to some internal and external factors. However, there is something that gives hope: the civil society that shapes alternative views as opposed to the mainstream. Even these efforts look like some drops of water in a ocean, they are at least something and will hopefully make a difference in the foreseeable future.

Sasun Khachatryan, Tert

Let's pin down the headline at the neighbour's!

Turkey-Armenia Journalists' Dialogue Programme

The most useful thing I learned during this program was that Turkey is facing other and probably more urgent and day-to-day problems than the Armenian Genocide issue. This is a great program that allows us to meet with Turkish journalists, bloggers and columnists. I hope this will enlarge our network, and become a solid basis for future cooperation.

Sasun Khachatryan, Tert

The program was intense and provided us with broader perspective of domestic and human rights issues in Turkey. As a suggestion I would propose organizing meeting with the representatives of Armenian community in Istanbul, and if the program continues, it can have a positive and tangible effect given the absence of diplomatic relations between the countries.

Naira Bulghadaryan, Liberty

As a person who's been in Turkey for the first time I felt the urge to learn more about Turkish-Armenian relations, and Turkey in general. I found many cases of human rights violations, which are interesting to me as to a journalist, covering human rights issues.

Karine Ionesyan, Lragir

Let's pin down the headline at the neighbour's!

Turkey-Armenia Journalists' Dialogue Programme

The program improved my understanding of Turkish political discourse, which is not always very well understood in Armenia. I somehow discovered another Turkey which is different from what is depicted in the media.

Karen Harutyunyan, Orakarg Daily, Civilnet

After my trip to Istanbul, I have more questions than answers, which is I think good; because things are usually even more complicated than you think. It is a possibility, to speak, to discuss and argue with representatives of Turkish society and have your own impression from this country.

Gayane Mirzoyan, Journalists for the Future

Let's pin down the headline at the neighbour's!

Turkey-Armenia Journalists' Dialogue Programme

It's important to visit the country and see it with your own eyes and not only through media. It's important for journalists, who shape public opinion to visit the country and report on what they experience on the spot. The programme helped me to get to know journalists and social media activists from Turkey.

Gegham Vardanyan, Internews

For me the program was very interesting and well organized I believe this is a unique opportunity to visit so many media, outlets, see how they operate and ask sensitive questions in person. I think these kind of visits are very important for both sides to understand that we have many similarities.

Gayane Avetisyan, Yerkir Media

Feedback from the Participants and Organisations Visited

- Allow more possibilities and time to speak with Armenian community in Istanbul and migrants from Armenia.
- It would be interesting to meet not only media people, but also academicians and researchers, preferably in their working setting for instance at a university.
- Meetings with state organizations and religious authorities will help to get the full picture of Turkey's current situation.
